The King is dead, long live the King! At least for a little while. Michigan's market price of an ounce of gold (and its inverse, i.e., the interest rate) can be estimated from the perspective of the yield curve. We first built a time-series of the 10-year treasury yield from 1986 to today. The data is available from FRED. (click to enlarge) The first thing that we notice is that, at first blush, the yield curve is in a inverted wedge, i.e. the two-year and 10-year yield are both higher than the yield of longer-term bonds. This is a precursor to a recession. We can then fit a curve to the data to find the level of the yield curve (i.e., the spot where the curve intersects the 100, 200, and 300 bps levels), as well as their slopes. (click to enlarge) The slope of the yield curve is given by where b and m are constant coefficients and A is the area of the yield curve. The yield curve, including the slope and the zero point, is then integrated to find the market price of the Treasury, which we can convert to the spot price of gold using the relation (click to enlarge) Gold prices are then plotted against the yield of the 10-year UST. The slope of the line in the figure above is about 1.5%, very close to the prevailing trend in the price of gold. This is an indicator of the current cycle of asset price inflation. There is also a significant gap between the market price of gold and the market value of the present government debt outstanding, that is the IOU. (click to enlarge) There are two potential interpretations of this gap. On the one hand, we can assume that the gap is due to inflation because the value of IOUs is inflated due to the fact that they are denominated in nominal, rather than real, dollars (i.e., the fraction of nominal IOUs that is in gold). This is the same argument used to support the view that the risk of default on the IOU is decreasing as nominal bonds become cheaper. On the other hand, we can assume that it is due to finance channeling. The first point is that, in this scenario, the real-dollar value of government bonds is increasing, which tends to
