This poor response could be due to local circumstances or to a lack of colonisation of the nares, as already documented in other studies ([@B2], [@B16], [@B18], [@B19]). The results demonstrate that *S. aureus* was isolated from only 2 of the investigated nasal swab samples. A higher prevalence of nasal *S. aureus* carriage was found in children, in agreement with other studies ([@B2], [@B16], [@B19]). The observed occurrence of nasal *S. aureus* carriage in 4 out of 10 investigated healthy adults and in 9 out of 25 healthy children points to the fact that nasal carriage of *S. aureus* is not an exclusive prerequisite for VAP development ([@B20]).
