On the night of May 14, a tearful Blake Shaw notified police that his mother, Irene Shaw, had been shot to death in the early hours of May 13 at her home in Castaic Lake, California. She was 61. The next day, authorities received a tip from a janitor at the Los Angeles apartment complex where Irene Shaw once lived, leading them to discover that her ex-husband, Frank Butler, was the last person known to have seen her alive. On June 18, 2012, Frank Butler was arrested by the Los Angeles Police Department and charged with murder. At the time, the police had not made clear whether they had learned of an alleged accomplice to the killing. Almost four years later, the detectives who had investigated the case were summoned to court to testify on Frank Butler's behalf at his trial, which was to begin Monday. The case had been a thorny and contentious one for the police department, the Los Angeles Times reported. The dramatic testimony of the two detectives playing key roles in the case had been attracting a lot of media attention, but they played down the fact that they have served for several years as top advisers to Los Angeles Police Chief Charlie Beck. Witnesses at the trial told conflicting accounts of what Frank Butler and Irene Shaw were fighting about. Frank Butler's lawyer, Stephen Manning, cited the testimony of a neighbor, who claimed to have overheard the argument, as evidence of how the case was framed. The chief of police stood behind the two detectives at the trial, saying that he thought they made "the right calls." The jury had to decide whether Frank Butler was guilty of first-degree murder. It took six hours to convict him on Tuesday. The tense atmosphere in the courtroom has sparked a heated debate on the Internet. The Times of London suggests that many pro-police forums on the Web contain a rash of new posts arguing that "poor, uneducated blacks" are being "framed" by the justice system. The message is sometimes repeated that the officers have been indicted for lying on the witness stand in the case. In a posting on the Web site of the National League of Black Women, Nubia Clemons writes: "Why have we seen other cases go by the wayside, as well as the shoddy handling of Frank Butler's trial? ... The idea of officials attempting to frame a black man, especially one that has bff6bb2d33

One of the biggest, and fastest growing issues facing humanity right now is undoubtedly the planet's climate. There is a looming and alarming threat from greenhouse gas pollution that is going to prove extremely difficult to avoid. Whilst physicists are trying to avoid a doomsday scenario by dropping the question 'can we be prevented from tipping into global warming state?' there are many good reasons to believe that we should be extremely worried about the consequences of human activity. But could current civilisations be able to survive? The following is a commentary by Tim Sylvia, graphic designer/freelance artist of what he thinks about this matter. Space elevator "The Orion space elevator works from the top of the Launch Pad 39A at Kennedy Space Centre in Florida and ascends to orbit the Earth. The elevator consists of a spring-loaded counterweight called a satellite, and a connector called a tether. A vehicle at the top of the tether would travel through the atmosphere to a point called an apogee located at about 35,786 kilometers, from where an electric current aboard the tether would accelerate the vehicle upwards. From the apogee the vehicle moves down the tether, in turn lifting both the vehicle and the counterweight closer to Earth. Eventually the vehicle comes to the end of the tether. The tether then acts like a bungee cord to thrust the vehicle back above the orbit. The vehicle would detach from the counterweight and stay in orbit past the end of the cable." Extraterrestrial terraforming Some revolutionary new technology has been created to stop the greenhouse effect and save us from a climate change killing apocalypse. The idea is based on the theory of space elevators and the elevator actually actually exists (see below image). What this idea proposes is to try to hang a huge object, as high as a shooting star, from the bottom of our atmosphere. The gravitational effects of this object would pull carbon
